

REAL-TIME ACCOUNTING

If you prefer learning about problems in your business long after you could have fixed them, then don't change a thing.

For a very long time, business leaders managed using periodic, retrospective reports. This reporting helped them see what mistakes had been made, what could have been more profitable, and which customers weren't paying on time.

Many successful business owners still manage this way. They hire accounting staff to keep up with the reporting, compliance, and operational details it takes to keep the lights on, collect from customers, track inventory and manage payroll.

*Did I price too low? Did I spend too much?
Did I extend too much credit?*

But today's innovative businesses look at things a little differently. Why wait till after month end to fix what's wrong? Why not track key performance indicators on a real-time basis, so you can see what's working? Why not use data to learn what your clients buy and what they never even consider?

And why spend your time managing accounting staff to do what experts can handle for you? You probably have a few other things to do.
